"It was the most frightening experience in my life," Dave said. "Yup. But what a photo you got there!" I answered. We were smack-talking and remembered about a pretty extreme ride.

We were filming one more series of our TV-cycle about nature. This one was about the famous Stardrop Hills woods. A quiet, undisturbed place.

The first day has past peacefully — birds, squirrels, hedgehogs...

After that, something bigger has shown up.

For complexion of the picture, we decided to photo-hunt some black-hood foxes — a pretty rare thing they are. We moved to place where they appear most frequently. Cameras were set, we were waiting.

"Guys," said Dave, our main biologist, a man with an awesome "woodchopper's" beard and pretty soft around the edges.

"I think we'd better get away. Now"

A bear was not pleased by our presence, and now he was showing it by roaring and coming in our direction.

"Grab the equipment! Go!" shouted Jack, the guy you hear while watching our cycle (there he is, running in front of Dave ~~dressed in~~ and wearing his usual black T-shirt and his usual gray pants)

We all showed a wonder of agility trying to run fast and not to start falling and rolling down the hill. Mike, our cameraman, somehow managed to turn back (running) and take a photo. He did it at the moment when I nearly ~~fall~~ started falling and rolling. Nice one, Mike. A pity Dave has got a better picture.

We did it. We've lost a camera but we ¹⁵⁰ made it to our car.

"Phew," said Dave, breathing hard. "Now, when I escaped a bear,

YOU MAY USE THE REVERSE SIDE

I feel I can do everything."

"Go grab that camera then," I offered.

"Everything except this."
